

Despite the many successes and advancements in the field of children's environmental health over the past few decades, today's children face an epidemic of illness and chronic diseases linked to environmental exposures and our changing climate. As stated in the Blueprint for Protecting Children's Environmental Health and Urgent Call to Action, there is an urgent need to put children and families back into the forefront of our nation's actions regarding health and environment.

All working in the field of children's environment health must rally and work together to meet this need; to raise awareness and understanding about the critical issues facing our most precious resources; and to mobilize action.

Raising Awareness, Celebrating Children's Environmental Health, Creating a Movement!

As a means to create a children's environmental health movement and a strong network of advocates, CEHN is spearheading the establishment of an annual Children's Environmental Health Day (CEH Day), to be celebrated every second Thursday of October during Children's Health Month.

The inaugural children's environmental health day is
